work at Dundee on the following Monday. I asked how he came to get employment in Dundee, and he said - "by enquiry." He had never named Dundee before. He said he was to leave next morning by the steamer Cambria from the Dundee dock, and that his wife was going with him. I told her that I should not have gone. On the Saturday morning I saw them both on board the Cambria. I saw my sister alone in the cabin. I said to her why did he not go by himself? and she said she had asked him to go alone first and he had answered what could he do without her. I thought it a strange thing they were doing, and tried to persuade her not to go. I asked her if she was sure he had got a situation in Dundee and she said only by what he said - unless he was telling her falsehoods. I thought she would rather not have gone.
